But again there are many cases where undoubted benefit can be given. From what has been said, it is clearly seen how important it is that treatment should be continued in acute cases for some time after the suffering is relieved. By the use of remedies the retrograde process is materially assisted, and by the frequent use of the air bag, the tube is kept open, and the tympanic cavity supplied with air. The use of the pneumatic speculum also serves to assist, by exercising the membrana tympani, and the chain of bones, preventing the formation of contractile false bands, and pseudo ankylosis of the ossicular joints. The use of these two instruments is also important in the treatment of the chronic forms. Most of these are progressive, and the persistent inflation of the drum, and the exercise of the membrane serves to...
