Excerpt: . roots to remain in place beyond the normal period. One writer has said: It should be borne in mind that the interdependence of the teeth is so great at all times that the loss of one or more at any period in their history must have a marked influence upon the remaining teeth. To illustrate the bad effects of premature extraction of the deciduous teeth, a case recently came into my hands for treatment that illustrates the statement in a forcible manner. In the upper jaw the permanent incisors, the permanent molars and the permanent first bicuspid are erupted and in the arch. The second temporary molars are the only deciduous teeth left in the arch and they occupy their proper positions. The temporary cuspids had been extracted, and the arch has contracted until it is closed, leaving no spaces for the permanent cuspids, which have not yet erupted but which can be distinctly seen appearing out of the line of occlusion and high up in the jaw under the lip. This condition was caused by the extraction of the temporary cuspids when the child was but eight years old, in order that the permanent lateral incisors might have room to get into the arch in proper alignment. The result was the contraction of the bones of the jaw and the closure of the arch, because the permanent cuspids had not sufficiently formed to come down into the space. As a natural consequence...
